

October 21, 2016

Revera has received notice of application for a class action lawsuit. Following is the company's media statement:

We are deeply sympathetic to the Dekervor family, as we are to all families in our communities when a loved passes away. We do not believe that this lawsuit has merit and we intend to participate in the court process. As this matter is before the courts, and with respect for the system and for all parties involved, we cannot provide further response on the matter.

Long term care providers deliver care to individuals who are often near the end of their lives and face many complex and rapidly evolving conditions. This can be a difficult and emotional journey for both the individual and their loved ones, and we empathize with that.

We have served communities in Canada for more than 55 years, and provided care to hundreds of thousands of people. We are currently home to more than 10,000 long term care residents, with whom we collectively have millions of individual interactions every day. Above all else, the care and safety of these residents is our top priority.

Our employees care deeply about the individuals they serve, and strive to provide comfort, care and compassion every day. Our homes meet and regularly exceed government standards, and our commitment to innovation in senior's care has enhanced the services we provide.